

The Vyne: A Tudor House Revealed

The Vyne, a Hampshire country house in the care of the National Trust, has always been a building of great interest. Much of this appeal is due to the way in which different periods of construction and furnishing interlock with each other, and to the links the house has with the Tudor period, and particularly with the court of Henry VIII. However, until archaeological recording was carried out during 1996-98, the early Tudor house was largely misunderstood. The extent and extraordinary character of this great house, built for King Henry's Lord Chamberlain, William Sandys, and his wife Margery, is now revealed for the first time, both in the context of a great courtiers life and against the broader background of archaeology as a constantly changing technique.

As the former Tudor power house undergoes a £5.4 million roof project, we're shining a spotlight on fascinating stories from its past.
